SOCIAL MEDIA (from page 7)

I kept returning hoping to hear better reports, but rarely did anyone walking off that Wall this year have anything positive to say including me.

So while it is great to get more people into fishing, we do so at our own expense. With more people comes more fish being taken or killed by mishandling. The newer generation of fisherman are coming in faster than the older generation is leaving. This, combined with the ever lasting land rights and right of way battles fishing areas face every year, we have more fisherman than ever before fighting for less fishing space than ever before. A combustible problem to say the least.

“So what do we do?”

First and foremost you can control what YOU put on the internet. While nobody will stop you from doing so, next time think about what is in the background of your photo. Is it showing identifying landmarks that will hint as to where this fish was caught? Did your phone tag the location automatically? These are common things that people neglect to catch before posting.

Also if you see fishermen that seems to be new at it, don't be afraid to talk to them. Offer assistance. If they learn from you the right way, that may help prevent some of these issues from happening.

But most of all, what you can do is enjoy fishing! Do not fish because you want to show everyone that you caught a schoolie before anyone else. We fish to GET AWAY from the world, not bring the world INTO our lives. It is okay to be disconnected from the world at times.
